The Topics

Forestry as an asset class for Institutional Investors in DACH

Available concepts / strategies and regional characteristics

Portfolio diversification and a hedge against inflation

Timber investments as part of a circular economy in a sustainable context

The role of Timber in the protection of biodiversity and the reduction/storage of CO₂.

The Objective

Investing in forestry extends beyond being an exclusive insight for affluent families seeking intergenerational capital growth. We are likely witnessing the onset of a new institutional investment trend. Timber possesses attributes highly valued in institutional portfolios, including diversification, inflation resistance, consistent returns, environmental advantages, and the scarcity of natural resources.

Furthermore, the use of timber in manufacturing plays a crucial role in reducing CO2 emissions. Timber serves as a sustainable alternative to fossil materials, contributing significantly to carbon sequestration. This aspect aligns with the growing global emphasis on addressing climate change and promoting environmentally responsible investment choices.

Moreover, technological advancements are poised to redefine the significance of timber products. Many items currently derived from fossil materials can soon be manufactured using timber. This transition marks a significant stride towards establishing circular economies, fostering biodiversity protection, and ensuring sustainability on a global scale, with the added benefit of substantial CO2 reduction.
